Aug 11, 2018 I really just wanted to find a "all in one" diagnostic tool that work very similarly to MRI. I am trying very hard to avoid using MRI. A: 'MRI' means 'magnetic resonance imaging', and it's the first thing I think of when I hear it. It's used to look inside the body to determine the structure of the organs and see if they're healthy. In short, it's one of the most important diagnostic tools available. I don't really like the way that's turned in the question, because it really isn't about the types of tools at all. Your question should be about the tools used to do an MRI. I imagine they might be more expensive and more complicated than basic tools. But in any case you've asked us to guess, so you'll have to trust us to guess well. A: I'm going to have to go with "dirt". If you're talking about a medical tool that creates a magnetic field to look inside the body, then you could say that it's "naturally magnetic" and so is dirt. :-)

For a stretch of sunny days in early July, California resident Jay Amundson was able to visit the Utah desert and look up at the sky. "It was just beautiful," Amundson said of the
